SHELTERED INSTRUCTION is an instructional approach to teaching English language learners. While not a program in itself, sheltered instruction extends the time in which students participate in instruction that explicitly provides language support as well as standards-based content instruction. This focus on building knowledge of academic language, content, and performance helps prepare English language learners for non-sheltered classes, in which they will be expected to achieve to high academic standards alongside their English-speaking peers.

Similarly, the new English Language Development (ELD) Standards for New Mexico emphasize language, content, and the support necessary to make language and content accessible for all students. These standards mindfully prod us to consider the importance of Content and Language Objectives and the mutually beneficial support these provide to the instructional process. In short, the new ELD standards can be the bridge to enable learners to access the content requisite for academic success.

Differentiating Instruction for English Language Learners

The Marriage of Sheltered Instruction with the New English Language Development Standards

JANUARY 26

Patricia Latham and Adrian Sandoval will focus on the new language standards, sheltered instruction (a means for making content comprehensible for ELLs as they are developing English proficiency), academic language, and how language is linked to the demands of testing. The afternoon will be devoted to a hands-on experience that will allow participants to reflect upon the role of lesson preparation for English Language Learners and Academic Language Learners (all students) while providing a framework for planning instruction with the language demands of a content area as a constant and integral point of reference
